

A Storytelling Adventure
STANLEY PARK

Horses have been featured in Stanley Park for well over a century. At first, the miners and loggers used them for hauling and clearing trails. In fact, some of the park's existing trails were cleared by logging companies. (Oxen were used, too). Not long after the park was dedicated in 1889, a gentler use for horses began.

A century later, the clip-clop of horses still echoes in the park. Some of these gentle giants stand 2.4 m tall, have feet the size of frying pans, and consume 27 kg of food and 100 L of water a day.

Stanley Park Horse-Drawn Tours has been transporting people around the park in these colourful trams since the early 1980s. The trams today are designed with the comfort of the horses in mind, using a freestanding tongue and aluminum frame. They have some features the old Tally-Ho drivers would find astonishing, including signal lights and hydraulic brakes.

But one thing hasn't changed, these are still organically powered vehicles. Electric trams, running on hay and oats: a fun, environmentally friendly way to see the jewel of Vancouver.
